

AN ATLAS OF OIL AND GAS DEPLETION

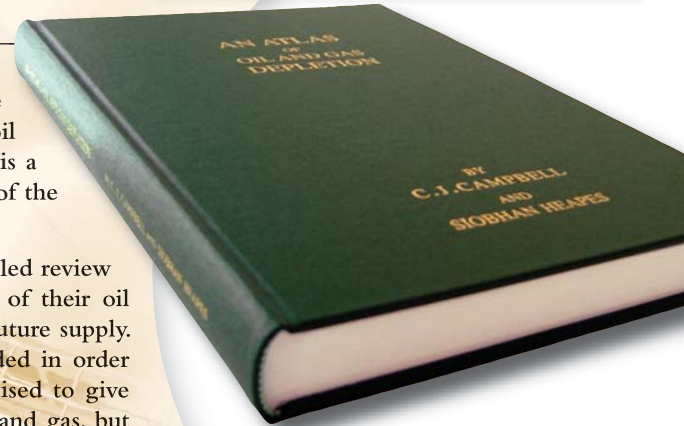

— COLIN J. CAMPBELL AND SIOBHAN HEAPES —

In recent years, soaring oil and energy prices have led people to ask if the world is running out of oil. The simple answer to this question is: Yes, because oil resources began to decline as soon as the first gallon was used. Yet the world is a long way from finally running out. We are facing the dawn of the second half of the Oil Age, when production gradually declines towards final exhaustion.

An Atlas of Oil and Gas Depletion lifts the lid on the world situation with a detailed review of some sixty-five oil-producing countries. It describes the essential features of their oil industries, and includes records of discovery and production and a forecast of future supply. A brief summary of the history and political situation of each country is added in order to examine how the country is placed for the future. The results are summarised to give regional and world totals. The work concentrates mainly on conventional oil and gas, but also summarises the non-conventional sources, including those coming from the tar-sand, deepwater and polar domains. It is written in straightforward, non-technical terms.

In a sense, the study poses a challenge for those with new information to come forward and present it in detail on a country by country basis so that the discrepancies and anomalies can be identified and resolved. The Atlas sets the framework for further investigation.
